

Foreign miners headhunt in SA

Johannesburg - South Africa is a poaching ground for Australian and Canadian mining companies, a mining industry survey released on Tuesday revealed.

"SA is renowned for its mining expertise and the industry is competing for skills in the global resourcing market," said Landelahni Business Leaders chief executive officer Sandra Burmeister.

Research carried out by the human resources company showed that the South African mining industry had met many of the employment equity and skills development challenges it had faced over the past few years and far exceeded other industries in training.

"The mining industry has been sorely challenged and it has responded positively," Burmeister said.

The survey showed that black representation in the mining industry at top management level more than doubled from 12.5 percent in 2001 to 30.6 percent in 2006, ahead of the all industry average of 22 percent.

The biggest single shift took place at non-executive director level - from 0.5 percent to 37 percent.

However, according to the survey, in management, professional, skilled and semi-skilled categories, mining lagged behind the all industry average. - Sapa

Published on the web by Business Report on July 22, 2008.

---

© Business Report 2008. All rights reserved.